My Editor Mary always refuses to let me label my example patients with names like Jake or Fluffy, or Puss n Boots.

One of the more common reasons for caretakers to take their furry friend to their doctor is for the diagnosis and treatment of lumps, bumps, warts, growths, and many other descriptive terms for things that grow in, on and under the skin. Cosmetic surgery to remove various benign skin lesions from our pets is a multi-million dollar industry just like it is in people. Warts are contrary to popular belief not obtained by touching the bumps on a toad, and they won't go away by rubbing an old rag on the warts. But nevertheless it's cheaper and healthier for your pet to do the old rubbing thing than to remove them surgically. Many, but not all warty growths can be eliminated simply by giving the body a little direction. Having a Homeopathic consult can reveal a remedy that will instruct the body to reabsorb the wart over time. When the proper remedy is given it invigorates the doctor inside all of us to identify the foreign tissue (wart), attack it with inflammation, and remove it. They will eventually either drop off or shrink in size until they are completely gone. Now I'm sure there is not one of us that want to look at or feel warts and skin tags on our pet's fur when we groom and brush them, but it is really in their best interest if we leave most of them alone. Cosmetic surgery can and has been in my experience a detriment to many middle to older age pets. Unless the skin growths must be removed for an important reason like bleeding, or malignancy, it is better to leave them alone. When the body has packaged up and focused disease energy on the surface as in a wart and then that wart is removed the bodies energetic focus then goes back inside to a deeper more vital place like the heart, liver and kidneys. Time and time again within weeks of elective surgery for benign skin issues a pet has experienced severe side effects and become very ill or even passed away. It is not without much clinical proof that excessive vaccination is often responsible for the development of skin cancers and benign warts. When good homeopathic antivaccinosis remedies are used properly tremendous progress can be made to treat these skin issues without surgery. A future column will cover this in greater detail.
